

It is ridiculous that TV stations can air violent programming (during prime time--if not on a show, then in an ad for an upcoming episode), such as a person getting their head shot off, or a dead rape victim in a crime show, but we cannot show the naked human body, the most natural thing of all. The uproar about Janet Jackson's breast (which you could barely see) was a waste of time when I can walk down the street and look at the crotch and the barely covered breasts of a woman in a window's print ad. Or just watch a Victoria's Secret ad. I've seen more breast watching the Oscars than I did during that SuperBowl half time. Not that there is anything wrong with basic nudity. I would choose to have my child watch a naked woman in a shower on TV than for them to see a woman victimized, brutalized, and degraded--which is shown on TV every day. Which message should we be sending our kids?
